A DANGEROUS ENEMY TO WHITE PINE

W. O. Frost, State Forestry Department. Too few Maine people realize or appreciate the great asset white pine has been and still is to the State of Maine.

The first sawmill in Maine was operated at Berwick in 1631. The next mill to operate was at Penobscot in 1693. By 1831 the mills at Penobscot had an annual output of 30,000,000 feet, principally white pine.

For a number of years Maine has held third place in the cut of white pine by states, cutting one sixth of all white pine lumber manufactured in the United States. In 1919 the cut was nearly 255,000,000 feet. When you consider that white pine lumber has been going on in Maine nearly 300 years and that the state still furnishes one-sixth of the pine lumber of the United States you must realize that Maine is well named the "Pine Tree State."

In 1919 the white pine cut in Maine sawmills was valued at approximately $7,100,000, of which pine owners received $1,500,000 in stumpage.

Today Maine has approximately 3,000,000 acres of pine lands, 1,500,000 acres of which is immature growth. We find reproduction coming in throughout the southern half of the state. It is this young growth that the farmer, laborer, mill owner, and manufacturer must look to in the near future.

Whether it ever reaches timber size depends upon what action the owners take in protecting their growth from white pine blister rust.

White pine blister rust is a European disease with a bad reputation in its native country. It has made the growing of white pine impossible in Denmark, Holland and England, and is now threatening to make the growing of white pine impossible in the United States.

Blister rust is not caused by a bug or worm, but is a toxic form of plant life which lives in the inner bark of white pine trees and in the leaves of all varieties of currant and gooseberry bushes. It is a fungus, a parasitic fungus, parasitic on white pine and currant and gooseberry bushes within 500 feet of pine trees. The tree cannot spread the disease to another but can cause infection on currant or gooseberry bushes, and they in turn spread the disease to pine trees. Because of the fact that wild currant and gooseberry bushes are common we find blister rust on pines in every town in the southern half of the state.

Surveys show that the disease is spreading very rapidly. Seven to eleven per cent of all pine trees in certain sections of the state have blister rust. Sample quarter-acre plots show even greater percentage of infection, running from 25 to 50 per cent. Once a pine tree becomes infected it surely dies. Therefore it is but a question of time before the pine area of Maine will be come so badly infected that pine reproduction will never reach a timber size.

The United States Department of Agriculture and the state are cooperating with towns and pine owners in combating this disease.

During the summer of 1922 eradication was carried on in 17 towns, mostly in York county. Nearly 500,000 currant and gooseberry bushes were pulled from 12,000 acres, representing 444,444 square feet of land at a cost of less than five cents per acre.

"Folks live longer in Maine" according to an announcement here today from the office of the Maine Public Health Association.

The announcement is based on a study of mortality statistics for Maine and the other 33 states in the registration area, made by the Statistician of the National Tuberculosis Association.

The study was made at the request of the Maine Public Health Association following a recent announcement from Washington that Maine had one of the highest death rates in the entire country. It develops that the figures on which the original announcement was made had not been classified with relation to deaths of non-residents and other factors which—when considered—give Maine a decided advantage when compared with the average from other states.

Here are some of the interesting facts disclosed in the analytical study which was made by Miss Jessamine Whitney, Statistician for the National Tuberculosis Association:

The average age at death for the 34 registration states for the year 1920 was 42.1 years. For the same year the average age at death in Maine was 49 years.

The death rate in the registration area for the year 1920—the most recent year for which complete figures are available—for the following diseases, typhoid, influenza, tuberculosis, diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles, whooping cough, syphilis and crop was 212.3 per 100,000 population. The rate in Maine for the same diseases in that year was 108.6 per 100,000 population.

In Maine 93.1 per cent of our entire living population in 1920 was 45 years or older. In the remainder of the country only 59.5 per cent of the population was 45 years old or older. For all age groups under 45, however, the percentage of living population is smaller in Maine than is the average for the entire country.

In certain diseases—not communicable—the death rate in Maine is higher largely due to the fact that the diseases listed are usually diseases of middle and advanced age. The figures for Maine and for the registration area are:

Cause of death	Death rate per 100,000 population—1920
Organic diseases of the heart	187.0 141.0
Acute nephritis and Bright's disease	111.7 59.4
Cancer	122.4 83.1
Cerebral hemorrhage and apoplexy	183.2 89.9

The death rate from pneumonia in Maine during the same year was 101.9 as compared with 137.5 for the registration area.

The infant mortality in Maine was 102 as compared with a rate of 86 for the birth registration area.

While the figures show Maine to be a much more favorable position among the states than was indicated by the original announcement, the Maine Public Health Association calls attention to the fact that there is yet a great deal to be done—especially in the prevention of communicable diseases—before Maine can justly claim to be the "Healthiest State." Every citizen can help himself and his home state in this work by giving a greater degree of cooperation to the public health organizations in Maine and to the state and local health departments—all of which are fighting day in and day out for better health conditions in our state.

EFFECTS OF HOME TRAINING ON CHILD DEVELOPMENT

L. J. Follard, Professor of Education, U. of M.

In primitive life and in the early years of mankind the home has a very important part in the education of youth. In modern times the home has shifted its responsibility in a large degree upon the school. The function of the school is definitely in the training of certain fundamental subjects, but the school can never supply the training that the home should give the child.

The home should be considered as an environment, and every environment exerts a certain reaction upon the individuals in that environment. Any mother who watches the development of her child will discover that no two children grow up in the same way to the same conditions. Because of this difference in the nature of children it is necessary for those interested in the child to study his early life and the way in which he adapts himself to his surroundings.

Education as a whole is really the directing of observation. One learns, so as to be able to apply that training to the definite situations which that individual may meet later. If we have no power of observation we have no problems. Without problems, and those problems solved, there is no growth or development.

In the early training of a child a mother would consider three important points: the child's responsibility, and faith. A great many of our greatest children very early in life should be taught to regard themselves as the center of the world. This is brought about by training and the faith and guidance of the parents. This is brought about by training and the faith and guidance of the parents. This is brought about by training and the faith and guidance of the parents.

THE LINE OF LEAST RESISTANCE

The training of responsibility is a definite function of the home. Even the young child should have definite things to do, and be taught that these things are his, as little chores. As he grows older the child should be taught to observe, and his actions guided by the observations with the feeling that what ever has to be done should be done by him as far as he is capable of doing it. There has been a great tendency all through the history of mankind to shift responsibility on some one else. This tendency can be corrected only in the early development of the child in his home relations. If a child who has reached his teen age shows no sense of responsibility, we find it exceedingly hard to instill any such ideas in his mind or to make them a part of his training.

We have in the development of faith another function that must be largely brought out in the home life. This condition because of the difference in the nature of children it is necessary for those interested in the child to study his early life and the way in which he adapts himself to his surroundings.

A few children are grown up into men and women of great personality and character from the home where they received but little training and little character. A great many of our greatest children very early in life should be taught to regard themselves as the center of the world. This is brought about by training and the faith and guidance of the parents.

"MAN WITHOUT A COUNTRY" APPEALS TO ALL CLASSES

The Motion Picture News, one of the largest motion picture publications has the following to say about "The Man Without a Country," the American Legion film classic which comes to Odeon Hall, Bethel, under the auspices of the Geo. A. Mundy Post.

"Such a production as 'The Man Without a Country' deserves presentation in the best of houses, for no situation of it strikes a false note. Its historical interest is great. The development of such serious proportions that it terminated in the famous duel in which the brilliant statesman lost his life is pictured with all accuracy. It is one of the most dramatic of the many dramatic passages in the history of our country, and its handling here is truly great. Duncan McRae's interpretation of Hamilton is convincingly stately and human, and Charles Graham's playing as Burr is of the same high order. But the acting of Arnold Daly, the star, is perhaps the outstanding feature of the picture. His characterization of Philip Nolan, who in his exile grows to love his forbidden country more with each day, is one of the finest pieces of acting ever contributed to the screen."

Are We Awake to the Advantages of Our Country?

(By Garland W. Powell, National Director The American Legion Americanism Commission)

We never fully appreciate what we have till it is taken away. Have you ever watched from your window a blind man making his way slowly down the sidewalk? He taps with his cane on the stones ahead of him before he dares take a step. You may think idly, "What a pity to be blind." But suppose the thought strikes you to try out this condition actually, yourself.

You shut your eyes tight for a little while. You feel other senses come into play. You feel a cold air drifting in and rise to close your window. You stumble into the furniture and grope about with your hands. The window had been pushed up higher than you thought, and when you reach for it your hand finds nothing. You stagger and almost fall. You start back and for a moment you feel the darkness all about you, with all its possibilities for harm. Your eyes start open, and you draw in your breath sharply on becoming aware again of the sunlight and all the familiar objects about you. Suddenly you have been made aware of the blessing of your eyesight, which for all your waking hours you had been taking for granted without a thought. You will feel strangely happy and thankful, and aware of your good fortune.

This is the message embodied in The American Legion photoplay, "The Man Without a Country." We take too much for granted, in our appreciation of this country that is our own. We forget how very greatly the ordering of our whole lives is based on the underlying fact of this country that has given us birth. Our security, our progress, our sense of citizenship, the very establishment of our homes, and all that makes life worthy and promising is based on the establishment of our country with its laws and its great traditions. The concept of our country is the daylight of the soul. Take the light of the soul, it is given us all so freely that we often forget it.

The picture the American Legion is presenting, is the story of the man who lost his eyes to that sunlight and for so many a country. It is well worth seeing.
